☒ -- He was bright and cheerful, she was bright and cheerful. They met at a restaurant and seemed destined for a loving union, no matter what they did next. But their last Sunday dinner turned out to be their last. At the height of their relationship, Ben Walther and Kelsey McIntyre were on the same page. They would have brunch at Le Bernardin, then catch a matinee of "The Curious Case of Benjamin Button" before going to the Art Deco Grill for late lunch. The two men were engaged in March 2009, the month they both turned 28, and the pair had a detailed agenda for what they wanted in life. "We were both really into being healthy," McIntyre told ABC News. "We weren't in bad shape, but we were really eating healthy and we were exercising. We were going to have a family. We were looking to get married." Then, things started to change. "We were in bed and she was napping, and I was talking to a friend," Walther, 30, told ABC News. "I was just talking about, what's the future looking like for us? Where are we going? And then I was like, 'Do you think I should break up with her?'" At that point, Walther had not seen or spoken to McIntyre in nearly a month. And on her side, the architect of the relationship began to wonder if the two were even right for each other. "You want the opposite of the last person you were with," Walther said. "And so the next few weeks were a struggle. I just tried to reestablish this balance." The two made an attempt to reconcile, but it was too soon. Walther became distant and they started bickering about the future. "She was like, 'What's going on?' And I was like, 'I don't know, I think we should just split up,'" Walther said. "And then she was like, 'Why are we breaking up?' And I was like, 'Because I just don't think we're compatible.'" "What I've learned about love is that it's not always black and white," McIntyre said. "And he was always a very happy person. And I would be very happy. And that makes sense. You need both to be happy." After the split, their friends told them that 82157476af
